INTRODUCTION

Long a 'photomat', in the sense that Gisele Freund meant it, Yves Ullens decided at the age of 40 to pursue his hobby of the art of living. He put down his first marks as a teenager, in a makeshift dark room at his paternal grandmother's house: she was a photographer, filmmaker, writer, archaeologist and a friend of the explorer and photographer Ella Maillart. He spent the equivalent of his final year of secondary school in Newport, USA and there had the chance to study technique and above all, to learn how to look. As his teacher emphasized, a camera is not a gun. "It's not just about shooting, but about identifying what is meaningful to us in order to be able to transmit it. Looking means framing as we look rather than zooming in and observing light".

He was not yet attracted to the abstract – in fact as a teenager he was afraid of it. A trip to Turkey in 1996 gave him his first artistic experience; what might have been merely a holiday snap – a photograph of a salt lake taken through the window of a bus - proved to be pure abstraction, blurring perspectives into an unexpectedly formal series. The botched picture showed him the expressive power of colour and light joined by serendipity. A serendipity that Yves Ullens has been exploiting ever since by keeping his senses constantly alert. Beyond portraits and landscapes, the classic staples of the amateur photographer's repertoire, he sought other channels, transcending the emotional purpose of a fixed image, from memento mori to pure experimentation and creativity. An abstract series was born out of Senegal, as he re-invented the tricky cliché of a sunset taken from an aircraft. The Birth of Colours, an image taken in 1997 in Italy was a revelation, imposing its colours like a red carpet. A fishermen's hut called Casa Bepi in a back street of Burano, a narrow façade of intense colour riddled with deep cracks – "these defects that make things beautiful" he says – becomes a living thing in the evening light. Putting the shutter speed on manual and moving the camera by hand gives the hazy effect of a painted image and produces a subtle blend of tones.

Yves Ullens dances round his subjects like a whirling Dervish possessed by his mystical rite.

"Tracker of light", the expression coined by Genevieve Berge, has become his official title, explaining the daily quest of one who chases stardust as though in a trance, always ready to snatch an image.

At the crack of dawn, just as a ray of light peeps through a thin curtain, the hunt is on. More than light, it is colour that attracts him. This dance, which he compares to tai chi and gymnastics of the soul, creates a universe where matter, texture, shape, volume, colour and the "state of light" have their own life, freed from the purely figurative.

I am inviting you to play a game. This game involves using your memory. It involves colours; moving colours. You want to catch them and keep them with you. In reality you are remembering these moving colours because it's a dream; a dream of life. A snapshot of the senses.

In his series of painted-colour photographs, Yves Ullens captures the memory of these moving colours. The colours which flood his pictures. Yves Ullens traps the light and draws with the vibrations of photons.

Colour and light are all around us all the time, moving fast and furious. A perpetual movement but one which changes...at the speed of light. Where the painter would depict these vibrations with a brush, Yves Ullens, the photographer, the hunter, traps and pins down these resonances of colour and light with his camera.
